

Flu ends fowl play

CHRISTMAS dinner just wouldn't be the same without the turkey.

For many households, it's the one day of the year they serve it.

But there are growing fears supplies of the staple meat could be affected this year due to bird flu.

The grim warning follows news that cash-strapped families are already cutting back on Christmas trees, fairy lights and presents this year.

Farmer Charlotte Blackler has revealed she won't be selling the birds in an attempt to stop the spread of the virus.

Other suppliers are also taking measures to prevent it from surging.

Millions will be disheartened by the move.

In fact, the only ones welcoming it will be the turkeys themselves!
